As a 21 year veteran of radio, member of the RAB steering committee for 5 years and VP/GM for Clear Channel, Chancellor, Triathlon and others, I am appalled that the FCC would consider limiting the content of satellite radio. Consolidation has meant that the public is being served by several large corporate interests at the expense of local programming. Public Service, news, traffic and weather have all suffered at the hand of the conglomerates. All one has to do is look at the number of local news and traffic people employed by the stations compared to those numbers 5 years ago. The free market deserves to be just that- free. People deserve to have choices. Those choices are not available when groups own 85% of the market---- If consolidation is so good for radio and its content, why are the broadcasters so concerned that their programming can't stand up to competition from XM and Sirius? Let the people choose what they want to listen to- give them the choice. I would welcome a response
